FRIDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 3, 1858.

THE BONAPARTES OF BALTIMORE.

(From Appleton's New American Cyclopedia, Vol. III.)

The branch of the family residing in Baltimore, Maryland, was derived from the marriage of Jerome Bonaparte, brother of the Emperor Napoleon I., with Elizabeth Patterson, daughter of William Patterson, an eminent merchant in the city of Baltimore. She was scarce eighteen years of age when Jerome Bonaparte, in command of a French frigate, landed in New York, in 1803. She at that time, was distinguished by uncommon personal beauty, and is said, moreover, to have strikingly resembled the Bonaparte family. The fame of Napoleon insured for her brother Jerome a distinguished reception in America, and wherever he went he was most hospitably entertained. On visiting Baltimore he saw Miss Patterson, and soon became much attached to her, a partiality which she readily returned, and being ambitious in her views of life, she at once accepted his offer of marriage, and was united to him December 24th 1803. The marriage ceremony was performed by the Bishop of Baltimore, John Carroll, brother of Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, the signer of the Declaration of Independence, and in accordance with the ritual of the Roman Catholic Church. The marriage contract, considered of importance, was drawn up by Alexander J. Dallas, subsequently Secretary of the Treasury, and witnessed by several official personages, including the Mayor of Baltimore.

Jerome Bonaparte remained in America for a full year, visiting, with his wife, various parts of the country. At length they embarked for Europe in the Spring of 1805, in the American ship Erin, and arrived safely at Lisbon. The news of the marriage proved very distasteful to the dictator of France, partly because Jerome had dared to marry without his consent, and partly on account of his own wish to unite all his brothers to European Princesses. Before the newly wedded pair could reach Europe, an order went forth to every port under French authority, forbidding them to land. The hopes of the fair American were now forever blighted, as Napoleon sternly refused to recognize her marriage. Jerome left her at Lisbon, and hastened to Paris, hoping by a personal interview to soften the Emperor, directing the vessel to proceed to Amsterdam as the state of his wife's health would not admit of her undergoing a long land journey, even if a passport could be obtained for her, which was very doubtful. On the Erin's arrival at Texel Roads, Madame Bonaparte found that an order had been awaiting her coming, which prohibited her from leaving England, and she was obliged to wait for the vessel to be sent to her. The hopes of the fair American were now forever blighted, as Napoleon sternly refused to recognize her marriage. Jerome left her at Lisbon, and hastened to Paris, hoping by a personal interview to soften the Emperor, directing the vessel to proceed to Amsterdam as the state of his wife's health would not admit of her undergoing a long land journey, even if a passport could be obtained for her, which was very doubtful. On the Erin's arrival at Texel Roads, Madame Bonaparte found that an order had been awaiting her coming, which prohibited her from leaving England, and she was obliged to wait for the vessel to be sent to her.

Jerome, who was originally much attached to his wife, in vain petitioned the Emperor to recognize her, and was finally obliged to yield to the despot's iron will, and marry the Princess Catherine of Wurtemberg. After the downfall of Napoleon, Madame Patterson (as she was styled for a long period) visited Europe, and is said to have encountered Jerome Bonaparte, with his Princess, in the gallery of the Pitt Palace, in Florence. On meeting Jerome, started aside, and started to say to the Princess, "That lady is my former wife." He instantly left the gallery, and next morning departed from Florence. Napoleon Bonaparte never succeeded in inducing Pope Pius VII. to declare Jerome's first marriage null and void. To the Pontiff's honor be it said, he invariably refused, and this protest has of late been brought forward in a question involving the rank of the Baltimore Bonapartes as princes of the Imperial household. Madame Patterson has, since the birth of her son, generally resided in Baltimore, as she does at present, in the possession of abundant wealth. Notwithstanding her treatment by Napoleon she has always expressed the highest admiration for him, and prophesies that her grandson is eventually to succeed him as Emperor of the French—Jerome Napoleon, son of the preceding, born in England, July 7, 1805. His mother returned to the United States during his boyhood, and he was reared in Baltimore. He entered Harvard College and graduated from that institution in 1826.

Mr. Bonaparte had then some intention of pursuing the legal profession, but, though he studied for the bar, he never was admitted. He was married, however, to Miss Susan Mary Williams, daughter of Benjamin Williams, Esq., originally of Roxbury, Mass.—Miss Williams was a lady of very large fortune, which, united with Mr. Bonaparte's own property, has made him one of the wealthiest citizens of Baltimore. Since his marriage he has devoted his time to the management of a large estate, and partly to agricultural pursuits. He has two children: a son, Jerome Napoleon, born in 1832, now in the French army, and another son, Charles Joseph, born in 1832. For many years Mr. Bonaparte received a handsome allowance from his father, with whom he used to come of intimacy in his several visits to Europe. During the reign of Louis Philippe, Mr. Bonaparte was permitted to reside in Paris, but for a short period only, and under his mother's name of Patterson. Although travelling incognito, he attracted much attention from his singular likeness to the great Emperor. He has always been thought to resemble him more than any of the monarch's other brothers did. He is distinguished by the same shape of the head and perfect regularity of features, bronze complexion and dark eyes of peculiar tint, which Napoleon had, and which characterize the Corsican people. His figure, too, is in the picture of Napoleon. Mr. Bonaparte has long been on good terms with Louis Napoleon, and since his assumption of the imperial purple, has visited the French Court with his son, by the invitation of the Emperor. In regard to the validity of his father's first marriage with Miss Patterson, which, if fully recognized by the Court of France, would give him precedence over his half brothers and the Princess Mathilde, the children of Jerome's second marriage, nothing has yet transpired of a public nature. The refusal of the Pope Pius VII. to confirm the order of Napoleon I. declaring the American marriage null and void, is still maintained by the Papal Court. But up to this time, all transactions affecting the rank of Mr. Bonaparte and his children are considered of a delicate nature, in which the family alone, and not the community, have the right of inquiry. It is well understood, however, that Jerome Bonaparte is violently opposed to the recognition of precedents for the Baltimore Bonapartes, and as far as he is personally concerned, refuses to acknowledge his son and grandson by his name but that of Patterson. Jerome Napoleon, son of the preceding, born in Baltimore, in 1832. He entered Harvard College, where he remained two years, but was transferred to West Point Military Academy, where he graduated high in his class in 1852. He remained but a short time in the American army, for having visited France with his father, he attracted the favorable notice of Napoleon III., and receiving his commission in the service of the United States, entered that of the French as sub-lieutenant in the army. He took part in the operations of the French and English allies in the Crimea, and served at the siege of Sebastopol, in Gen. Boquer's division. For his conduct, which was considered gallant and meritorious, he received a decoration from the Sultan. He visited the United States in May, 1856. His appearance, handsome and martial, is not Napoleonic, like that of his father, he being tall and slender. He possesses fair abilities, and most amiable manners and character which win for him many friends. His desirability, of course, at present, mere matter of speculation, greatly depending on the will as well as the continued power of Napoleon III.
